(Acts 16:6) The Acts of the Apostles is the fifth book of the New Testament. It tells about what happened to the first Christians after Jesus' death. The book starts by describing how Jesus' followers were scattered after his death, but then tells how they began to spread the message of Christ throughout the world. The book also tells about some of their struggles and conflicts with other groups within Judaism, as well as with other religions. The book ends with Paul's martyrdom in Rome at the end of Given article text here The book of Acts is divided into two parts, covering Jesus' ministry before his death and the events that followed after. The first part of Acts (1-12) describes Jesus' teachings to his disciples, including his message about dying on a cross for their sins and rising from death to save them. This message was challenging for many people to accept. Paul, who came from Antioch (Syria), taught that gentiles could be saved without being circumcised and keeping the law, as recorded in Acts 15:1. Barnabas, sent by James, accompanied Paul on his missionary journeys, including his second journey with Silas and Timothy. Before Jesus' ascension into heaven, he promised a gift to his disciples, which they received on Pentecost day. This gift was the power of the Holy Spirit. Pentecost is considered significant as the birth of the church by many denominations and Christian scholars. In Acts 9, Saul (later known as Paul) went from Jerusalem to Damascus, where he encountered a light from heaven that revealed Jesus speaking to him. The sixth and seventh chapters describe Stephen's sermon before the Jewish Sanhedrin, which led to his stoning. Some of the Sanhedrin members began making biting motions at him during the sermon when he accused them of murder.
